

How to use What About Me?

A guide for parents, teachers, and child care providers

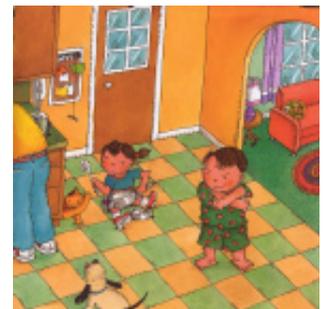

What About Me? 12 Ways to Get Your Parents' Attention (Without Hitting Your Sister) is a picture book children can enjoy simply for the subtly humorous text, the detailed illustrations and the gentle depiction of family activities. Just as important, Eileen Kennedy-Moore's story and Mits Katayama's pictures function on a second level for children who are tempted to act out because of sibling rivalry or the feeling that they are being ignored. It also shows adults the importance of recognizing children's need for attention, of teaching children positive ways to attract attention and of responding warmly to these positive efforts.

There are many ways to use this book at home, in child care settings and in the classroom. It's valuable with only children as well as those who have or are expecting siblings.

- Start by reading What About Me? aloud.
- Leave the book somewhere convenient, so children can easily look through it on their own.
- Be alert to children's efforts to try the strategies in the book and acknowledge these with praise or one-on-one time.

For subsequent readings of the book, Dr. Kennedy-Moore suggests discussion questions you can use either as you read or after you've reached the last page. It's unlikely that you'll use all the questions in one sitting, unless you're working with a group. Be guided by the interest of the children; some may not feel like discussing the story, but they will still benefit by hearing its gentle and affirming message.

Suggested discussion questions:

Do you know what it means to have people pay attention to you and what it means to be ignored?

How do you know when a grownup is paying attention to you?

Why do you think that grownups sometimes don't pay attention to kids?

What do you do when you feel left out or ignored?

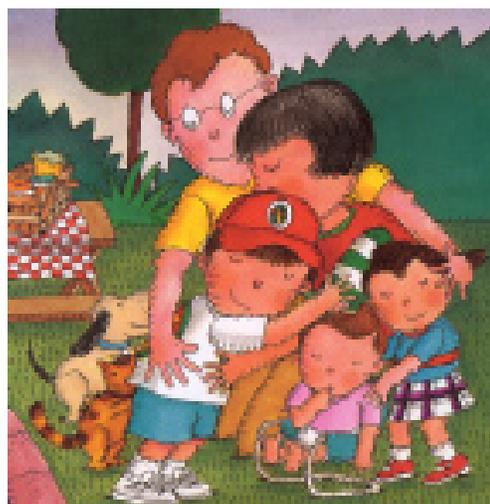

How is the boy feeling at the beginning of the book?

Do you think his parents are paying attention to him? How can you tell?

When do you feel like the boy in the book?

How is the boy feeling when he looks at his sister?

What would happen if the boy hit or poked his sister?

How well does hitting or poking work as a way to get attention?

How is the boy feeling at the end of the book?

Why is being kind or helpful a better way to get attention than hitting?

Which of these different ways to get attention have you tried?

How well do they work at home? In the classroom?

Which strategy for getting attention is your favorite? Why is it your favorite?

What other helpful and kind ways of getting attention can you think of?

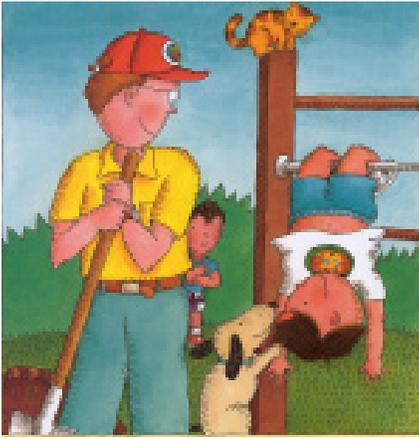

For children with siblings:

What's worst about having a brother or sister?

What's best?

What is your favorite thing to do with a special grown-up? (Your mother, father, babysitter, grandparent, aunt, uncle, etc.)

See the next page for additional activities for teachers and librarians.

How to use What About Me?

A guide for parents, teachers, and child care providers

Additional activities for teachers and librarians:

Vote: Ask children to vote on their favorite strategy from the book.

Pretend: Have children role play several of the strategies, with some children being the adults and others the kids. (Use puppets if kids are self-conscious or shy.)

Try: Ask children to each select a strategy to try at home—with a sibling, friend, neighbor, cousin or other relative—and then report back to the class what happened.

As part of the report, a child can discuss whether he felt successful in getting the attention he wanted.

This child can describe—or the group can brainstorm—how to be more successful in getting positive attention from adults: trying a different example from the book, or trying the same activity at a different time or under different circumstances.

Ask: Have children ask their parents, caregivers or other adults which ways to get attention the adults prefer.

Show: Have children draw pictures of themselves trying the strategies. Compile the drawings in a book or post them on a bulletin board with a title such as, “What About Us? How We Get Attention in Kind, Helpful Ways.”

Use an instant or digital camera to take pictures of children demonstrating the different helpful and kind ways of getting attention.

